In this interactive masterclass, Prof Roberto will lead several sessions examining how leaders make critical decisions through several case studies and exercises. This will be done by focusing specifically on an award-winning multi-media case study about the Columbia space shuttle accident, in which each participant will examine the events that took place from the perspective one of six key managers or engineers at NASA during the mission.

In addition, the masterclass will also delve into the 1996 Mount Everest tragedy to understand why the expedition leaders and their teams made faulty decisions that led to tragedy on the mountain.

Finally, participants will engage in a fun and competitive hands-on exercise that will enable them to learn about collaborative problem solving in teams.

Join this masterclass and learn:

How leaders can build buy in- and commitment as they make key decisions.

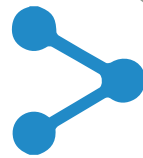

How leaders can ensure that team members share information effectively with one another as they collaborate.

How to design and lead decision making processes to avoid groupthink and insure high levels of critical thinking and analysis.

How to identify key traps that cause leaders and their teams to make flawed decisions.

What stops teams from achieving their full potential

How to create a safe environment for people to speak up on their team and examine why it is crucial for effective collaboration and decision making.
